

Astoria

(for Erik)

Maya Jewell Zeller

Winner of the Editors' Award in Poetry

Sophomore year, and my friends learned of sailors, renewable crews on the docks in downtown Astoria. Be, but don't look too grown up, the girls would tell you. Better than the boys at school, these men bring flowers, a box of shells from overseas, write letters. They know how to please a woman, can say things in Japanese. Run your hands over their pleats and tell them you're seventeen.

I was afraid of walking past the gulls, past the speckled piling beyond the tracks. I wanted things to be easy, but not that easy, so I hiked with a boy from biology up the hill to the Astor tower, sat barefoot and laced daisies between his webbed toes. Afraid to admit things, we talked about chlorophyll, sunlight, the water slapping itself out there in the Columbia. We talked college and greenhouse gases, rumors, the wind making a whistle across the cement sidewalk, a howl on the historic brass boat, shaking its wooden blocks, fancy plaque rocking.

Why didn't I kiss you then, while my friends went mad over Officer and a Gentleman, while I was still spotted with salt and good freckles? I could hear the foghorn baying, a new ship crushing the perfect wave-dents.
Barnacles on the hull, prow dipping like a mad whale, and my hair, a thick rope over sea-brown eyes, its wet and heavy net.